Caroline litigates healthcare, commercial, and institutional disputes for clients who need a sharp, detail-driven advocate from the first filing through trial.

Caroline brings a rigorous, client-centered approach to complex civil litigation, with a particular focus on healthcare litigation matters that sit at the intersection of regulatory exposure, institutional liability, and high-stakes dispute resolution. Working alongside Dorsey & Whitney's healthcare litigation team, she defends healthcare systems, providers, and other regulated entities against claims that implicate both operational and legal risk, including matters involving professional negligence, government investigations, coverage disputes, and liability exposure across state and federal courts.

Caroline's litigation practice extends beyond healthcare into commercial, ERISA, securities, and intellectual property disputes. That breadth means she can support clients whose disputes cross practice lines — whether a healthcare system faces a contractor dispute, or a financial institution confronts regulatory enforcement. She approaches each matter with the same discipline: understanding the facts before the law, and the client's business before the strategy.

Pro bono work is a consistent part of Caroline's practice. She provides direct legal representation to individuals who would otherwise lack access to counsel, and that hands-on advocacy developed through law school clinics and continued at Dorsey.
