Dak defends businesses and veterans in commercial litigation and government disputes, turning his former military career into precision advice and results for his clients.

Dak came to civil litigation by way of the courtroom — as a former infantry officer, U.S. Army Judge Advocate, and Special Assistant United States Attorney (SAUSA), he began his legal career prosecuting serious criminal offenses, advising senior military leaders on national security law, and ensuring federal regulatory compliance before entering private practice. Today, he brings that same disciplined, detail-oriented planning focused approach to business advocacy by prioritizing compliance, risk management, and dispute prevention, while providing strong representation when litigation is necessary. Dakota focuses his practice on counseling businesses, resolving commercial disputes through precise negotiation or strong advocacy and in government-related litigation.
