Hudson advises individuals and businesses on federal and state tax planning, compliance, and controversy so that tax obligations become a manageable part of their financial picture rather than an unexpected liability.

Hudson focuses his practice on tax law, working with individuals, families, and business clients to structure transactions, meet compliance obligations, and resolve disputes with taxing authorities. Whether the issue arises at the planning stage or escalates into a formal controversy, Hudson brings a methodical approach to identifying exposure and building a defensible position.

On the planning and compliance side, Hudson counsels clients on the tax implications of business formations, restructurings, and ongoing operations, helping them align their structures with current federal and state tax requirements. He also assists clients in navigating the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) audit process, responding to notices, and working toward resolution at the administrative level before litigation becomes necessary.

For clients whose matters do proceed to controversy, Hudson supports the development of legal arguments across the full dispute lifecycle — from initial examination through appeals. His background in both tax law and business finance gives him a grounding in the economic realities that drive the transactions and structures at the center of most tax disputes.
