Taylor brings strong research, writing, and analytical skills together with professional experience as a nonprofit leader to help clients navigate nuanced employment matters. Drawing on her background in strategic communications and organizational leadership, she approaches each matter with an eye toward understanding a client's goals, communicating clearly, and developing practical solutions.

Before law school, Taylor spent eight years in the Twin Cities nonprofit sector, where she led development and communications efforts for organizations working to advance women's representation and education equity. Her experience working closely with organizational leaders and stakeholders informs both her understanding of the issues employers face and her collaborative, relationship-focused approach to client service.

Taylor strengthened her skills in legal analysis and advocacy during law school, serving as Editor-in-Chief of the Mitchell Hamline Law Review and completing externships with two federal judges. She is committed to maintaining a robust pro bono practice and volunteers regularly in the Twin Cities community.
